CONCLUSION

4.1 Conclusion

Ten Indians is telling about Indian's life in discrimination on the lives of the Indians who live in the America that carried out by White Americans.

From the analysis, the study finds Nick's characterization based on character analysis and uses postcolonial ambivalence theory, that to find the forms of racial discrimination happens in the Ten Indians. As an America woman, Mrs. Garner's and Garners family clarify her sense of dislikes towards The Indians. Nick has image as an America men which the hypocritical, because it is the character of America who believe directly without checking first. Nick did not want all know that he actually had a relationship with a woman of India. Ambivalence postcolonial depicts the life the white Americans treat the Indians not as the Native Americans, they are treated as the people who do not deserve to live.

Based on the analysis, the study uses ambivalence postcolonial theory. The Ambivalence comes from the feeling of love and hate toward something.

Ambivalence is not only can be read as a sign of colonial subject trauma. In ambivalence postcolonial, there are three forms of happens that grow chronologically. The first, when Mrs. Garner's character. She says "Them Indians" for a couple of times to clarify her sense of dislikes toward the Indians. The second, when Joe's action that drags an Indian shows how bad they treat the Indians. "Bush" is a symbol that the Indians are only fit to live in a bad place, a place that we can find everything bad from it. The third, when Nick wants an answer from his father who said that he saw Prudence Mitchell with Frank Washburn when he was taking a walk in the Indian camp. Nick wants the correct answer from his father. He replied that is true he had seen Prudence Mitchell with Frank Washburn in the wood, near to the Indian camp this afternoon. He replies as he turns away and gives his back.

The last point, this story ends with an open ending because there is not certain conclusion that we can find from it. Nick just goes to bed and fall asleep, he does not try to ensure himself that his father is right or wrong. What are it is the character of every American who believe directly without checking first and easy to believe.

Based on the analysis, the study can conclude that is correct that Indians being discriminated by the white people. They assume that the Indians are not educated, so they don't need to be given the opportunity. The Indians are also used as an object only for a low view of white people towards them and have not regarded as nationals, though these Indians are residents and owners of the American continent. However, they are increasingly being pressured by the presence of white people. Finally, their existence slowly shift to remote area.
